INDUSTRIAL automation and control services company SAGE Automation is moving its headquarters to Tonsley.

The business is moving to the award-winning Main Assembly Building and its offices will span about 3100sq m.

Manufacturing and Innovation Minister Kyam Maher said SAGE Automation would have about 120 staff based at Tonsley.

"SAGE Automation is one of our biggest success stories (and) sees the collaborative benefits being co-located with other innovative businesses at Tonsley," he said.

"The company's focus on innovative industrial automation, best practice LEAN manufacturing and technology driven training aligns with the state's vision for Tonsley as an operating environment that facilitates high value industry, collaboration and economic development."

SAGE Automation managing director Andrew Downs said it was delighted to be moving its national headquarters to Tonsley. "It is an excellent opportunity for our company to work side by side with organisations like ours, who are driving the industrial future of South Australia," he said.

"We share a rich history with the Tonsley site, having delivered a number of projects for Mitsubishi years ago."

He said the new Tonsley facility would enable its team to work collaboratively.
