

Getting back to work safely

RESILIENT: Cheesemaker Kris Lloyd will join a discussion on Monday delving into how her business has adapted this year.

GETTING back to business is a real challenge for many South Australian small businesses owners at the moment, who need to consider myriad issues before getting themselves back “online”.

One of the key considerations is how to do it safely for themselves, their families and their staff, and how to be resilient and innovative in the face of adversity. A panel of three experts – Kris Lloyd, the dynamic owner of Woodside Cheese Wrights whose business was hit by both bushfires and COVID-19; Greg Jennings, the Head of Workplace at Beyond Blue, and; Glenn Farrell, the Director Compliance and Enforcement at SafeWork SA – will take part in a discussion this coming Monday about business wellbeing and the resources business owners can use to ensure they are abreast of the latest advice on COVID-19, and how to provide a safe workplace for their employees. You can watch the live stream from 10am on Monday at advertiser.com.au or on The Advertiser's Facebook page.

Questions can be submitted to the panel throughout the live stream, or can be emailed directly to cameron.england@news.com.au.

Ms Lloyd, who was recently honoured on the Queen's Birthday 2020 list, being named a Member of the Order of Australia, is a passionate advocate for “I Choose SA” and supporting local businesses through buying SA produce and products.